

NATO & the American Empire

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization is one of the cool things that get caught up in anti-lib hatred without nuance. We've all seen this at some point. The American Revolution is another example, people like to believe it was some "beginning of the end" situation & ignore that White boys goofin off is cool. The whole "no more brother wars" crowd is the same way.

NATO gets caught up in this because it's followed the same subversions as the EU & every Western government. This was made worse by the rise of slavaboos in the RW, who pretend that the whole "die for gay rights in Botswana" theme has been around for more than like 10 years. Beyond Eurasianist propaganda, NATO was formed purely as an anti-Communist organization. It had the sole purpose of counteracting the Soviet Union during the Cold War. It's continued existence has been vindicated by both the collapse of the US' warfighting ability & Russian invasions of Georgia & Ukraine - as well as being a pretty useful tool for the GWOT.

Firstly, war is never about ideology or any so-called 'higher purpose'. War is power, the ability to impose your will on the enemy. It's important to understand this when you encounter the prevailing thought in the US conservative sphere of being anti-war or subtly pro-Russia. The reason you should support Ukraine (if you decide to take sides at all) is because it is not so much a battle between Ukraine & Russia so much as it's a battle between the West & the BRICS sphere. You can see over how bad the ruling system in the West is, but it's much better for that system to be the ruling power of the world. That way we are free to deal with ideological conflict without external interference.

If you think that Russia is "le trad liberators of Europe" you're retarded & need a reality check on what Russian society actually looks like. STD rates & such will dispel any notions of some trad orthobro nation. Putin's government has done far worse to its RW activists than Western governments ever have. Their treatment of relatively moderate nationalist groups is worse than the US' treatment of Atomwaffen Division. White replacement is happening even faster in Russia than the West, including deliberately sending non-Whites to Poland & occupied regions of Ukraine as a form of biological warfare. The whole "trad russia" meme is a product of modern Active Measures, now aimed at 'dissident' movements like the MAGA crowd & AfD. You got psyop'd, dumbass. There's a reason groups like the Russian Volunteer Corps are fighting for Ukraine, and they're wearing swastikas instead of pride flags.

Regardless, the point is we should win. It doesn't matter how gay the current regime is, if we're weak now then we'll be weak when we take power. If we allow non-Western groups to take power, then we're losing our freedom to even begin to argue about ideological issues. Just like any issues between Sparta & Athens were put on the back burner until the Persians were forced back across the Aegean. It's easier to deal with issues in DC or Brussels than be under the thumb of Moscow.

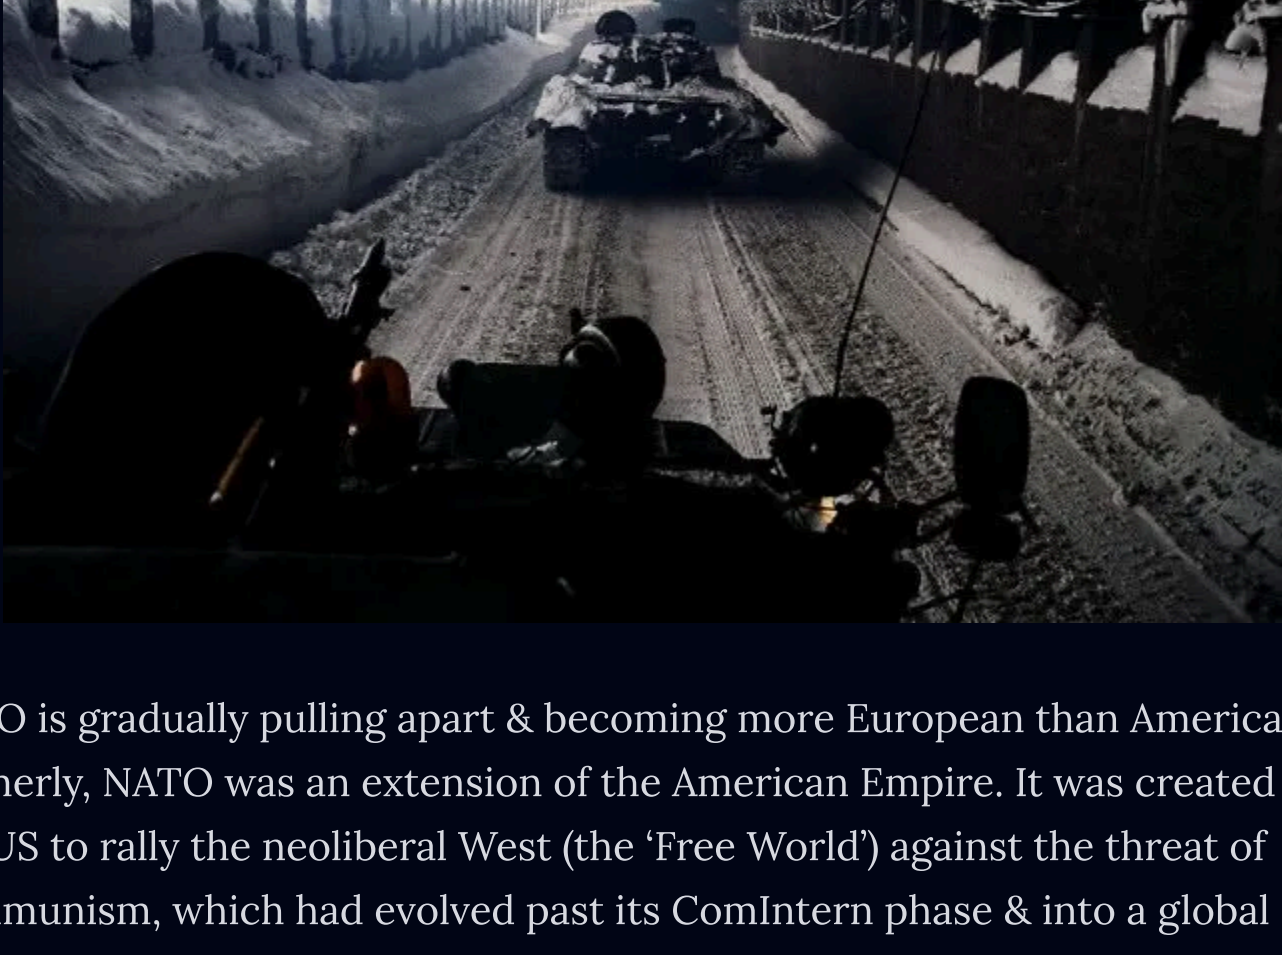

Moving on from that, Empire. Empires still exist, any claims to the contrary are just semantics. DC exercises a similar amount of control over its vassel states in the EU & beyond that Rome or Britain did with their provinces or colonies. The only difference is that Instead of swearing allegiance to Caesar or the Crown, they swear it to "Democracy". Recognizing this fact is important because it puts most world conflicts into a better perspective. American support for Israel is ultimately because Israel is a little slice of the West in the Middle East. It's a very strategically important position & a fairly powerful player, offsetting the influence from countries in the BRICS sphere (namely Iran). Talks of Jewish in-group preference & AIPAC corruption lobbying is secondary, although still true nonetheless.

Israel being the main power in the ME is a net benefit for the West, as much as we wish it was a different country with a different ethnicity. Not because of any sort of Zionist shilling, but purely because it's better than Iran or Saddam's Iraq controlling the region. Although its influence is dwindling due to domestic supply of oil, for the last 50 or so years whoever controlled the Middle East had leverage on the entire world. Were the Baathists' good leaders in Iraq? Probably, but I don't want Arabs having any sort of power over the West.

This is why we invaded Iraq btw, not because of pressure from "big oil" & certainly not to fight AQ. Saddam made a power play with taking Kuwait & planning to take Saudi Arabia back in '90. Not necessarily an unwise decision, the overwhelming response from the US was rather unexpected. At the time, Saudi Arabia was considered a relatively neutral country rather than a US vassal. This turned out false. The US didn't want to buy from Saddam & support his ambitions, so they conducted arguably the coolest war in history & annihilated the Iraqi Army in Operation Desert Storm (did more damage in 100 hours than Iran did in 8 years, lmao). The 2003 invasion that finally ended the Saddam government can be seen as the US tying up loose ends & consolidating its hold in the region in the face of the war on terror spreading throughout the Islamic world.

This same sentiment can be seen today in the issue around Taiwan. Taiwan isn't actually a US ally, the US only recently began to consider it an independent country. Until China started moving away from the US & becoming a world power of its own, we generally considered sides with China over them. The issue is that Taiwan is central to the production of computer components, specifically semiconductors. They alone account for over 20% of the global market, and usually provide some resources for other nations' domestic products. In a world where warfare is dominated by drones, ATGMs, HIMARS, etc. you can probably see how this becomes an issue. Any prospective war in Taiwan is about who controls this production. I don't think I need to explain why China having control of anything, let alone computer production, is a bad thing. South Korea & its tech industry is a similar situation.

This is an empire. It doesn't matter how a country like Iraq is actually ran, it's ultimately subject to the US in the same way Germania Major was subject to Rome. Unfortunately, as I've laid out in the previous couple articles, we are watching an empire in decline & this is affecting our global position - which has been on the downward trend since 2015. This has led to one interesting situation.

NATO is gradually pulling apart & becoming more European than American. Formerly, NATO was an extension of the American Empire. It was created by the US to rally the neoliberal West (the 'Free World') against the threat of Communism, which had evolved past its ComIntern phase & into a global empire of its own. The US was by far the biggest contributor to NATO, and formed its nucleus. In the event of a "Seven Days to River Rhine" scenario during the Col War, all other NATO members either filled the role of slowing down the red onslaught or reinforcing the US & UK militaries as they organized themselves.

This shifted in the 2000's, when Poland & the UK were the only countries to assist with the invasion of Iraq. Most NATO countries sent forces to Afghanistan & many to Iraq during the fight with AQ later on, but the refusal to assist the US' power play was telling. This led to the rifts that led people like Trump to question whether the US should even be in NATO. Interestingly, the sides flipped with the 2022 invasion of Ukraine.

Now, the Euro nations are the most enthusiastic members of NATO. The US has taken a step back in regards to the war, worried about being drawn into near peer conflict in the middle of widespread internal issues. The situation has escalated to the point that historically neutral countries like Sweden have applied for membership (albeit, Sweden was always been implicitly part of NATO if war actually broke out). There's also a noticeable difference in the political climate between Western Europe & the US. While demographic trends are gradually killing any prospect of a RW government in the US, Europe is seeing massive gains with parties like RN & AfD, particularly among youth. If both trends continue, we might see a world where the US & the EU become competitors on the world stage.

Be prepared for a day where pro-White Americans have to expatriate (back) to Europe if the situation becomes untenable in the colonies btw. Not a prediction, just a possibility.

Regardless, the point is there's a significant split happening between Europe & North America. In the past, pretty much any big cultural or political moods have been shared by the two, a good example being the simultaneous rise of the MAGA & Brexit movements in the US & UK. This split could be wholly temporary, but if it's not then the geopolitical implications could be significant. Not necessarily a whole separate power, but perhaps a relationship similar to Russia & China.

Dugin's ilk like to refer to this scenario as a 'multipolar world,' mainly in reference to Russia becoming the other pole against the "Atlanticists" (not a real thing btw). I think Russia's failings in Ukraine have proven that they will not usurp the West any time soon (ever), but the breakdown in US hegemony is still gonna cause some geopolitical crises. Russia can now effectively act as a regional power within the old Soviet sphere & provide some sort of competitor for non-Western aligned states - though China is doing a much better job at it.

The important thing to glean from all this is peace is entirely predicated on power. The world was relatively peaceful for about 30 years because of US hegemony - Pax Americana. Once there's competition, there's competing interests, and thus war. The days of rogue states going against the will of the gods of democracy being smitten by untouchable fighter jets are over, Saddam & Gaddafi were the last. Assad is the last of a dying breed. The number of "rogue states" will continue to grow, and the relatively powerful ones like Russia, China, or even regional powers like Iran & Venezuela will make power plays.

As it stands, the West will likely remain a roughly unified collective, vice possibly the US. Though this is still unlikely, even if the hegemony falls apart & the West's center of gravity moves towards Brussels. Prior to any ideological debate, there is first the question of sovereignty & power. Only once we are secure can other things be argued about.
